Behavior Follows Your Identity

Vikas Surani

Global Vice President – Growth | TEDx Speaker | IIMA

Hello Curious Minds,

What if I told you that lasting change doesn't come from forcing new habits — but by reshaping how you see yourself? 🤔

We often focus on changing behaviors, but maybe transformation happens when we shift our identity. When your identity aligns with your goals, actions follow effortlessly.

💡 The Identity-Behavior Connection

Think about it:

🔗 A person who identifies as a runner doesn't procrastinate hitting the track — they run because skipping a run feels out of character.

Someone who sees themselves as a lifelong learner doesn't have to remind themselves to read — they're naturally drawn to books, podcasts, and conversations that expand their knowledge.

A leader who believes in empowering others doesn't micromanage — they delegate and trust because enabling growth aligns with their core identity. The secret? Identity precedes behavior. When you start by defining who you are, your actions naturally follow.

🚀 Why This Matters Let's take leadership as an example. Saying "I want to be a better leader” focuses on the outcome. But when you say, “I am a leader who empowers and inspires,” your mindset shifts. Your decisions, interactions, and leadership style begin to align with this belief.

 Power of Identity: The Superman Pose Effect Ever heard of the Superman pose? Stand tall, hands on your hips, chest out — and you instantly feel more powerful. It’s not just a posture; it’s a signal to your brain that says, “I am confident, I am capable.” When you step into that identity, your behavior follows suit — you speak with conviction, you take bold actions, and you lead with confidence.

 A Personal Reflection When I embraced the identity of someone who thrives in uncertainty, everything changed. I stopped fearing ambiguity and started seeing it as an opportunity to explore, learn, and grow. This shift in identity made taking bold steps in unknown territory feel natural — because I was no longer just navigating uncertainty, I was someone who thrives in it.

 Learn from the Best James Clear, author of Atomic Habits, emphasizes this beautifully: “Every action is a vote for the type of person you wish to become.” Want to be more productive? Start by seeing yourself as a productive person.

 Challenge for You: Here’s something to reflect on:

What’s one identity shift you can make today that will redefine your actions tomorrow? Drop your thoughts in the comments — I’d love to hear them! 🧠

Until next time, Vikas Surani ✨
