Connecting the Dots

Hello, Curious Minds!

Before we dive in, a heartfelt thank you to the 2,000+ subscribers who've joined me on this journey. Your curiosity and support inspire me to keep sharing!

Looking back, life often feels like a mix of random moments—decisions, wins, and failures. At the time, they can seem unconnected. But with curiosity and reflection, you start seeing patterns and meaning in those moments. Sometimes, those dots you didn't realize were connected suddenly come together and show you the way forward.

This reminds me of Steve Jobs' famous speech, where he talked about connecting the dots backward. I've had my own experiences like this, where something I learned long ago suddenly clicks and makes sense today.

Here are a few moments from my journey where the dots connected:

1. The Early Spark

In college, I co-founded CiSA (Computer and Information Technology Students Association), focused on curiosity and collaboration. We also co-founded, Device Control over Internet project, with travel to over 10 institutes, over 100 students, and was about to be published with a VC institutes, won accolades, and was about to be productized with a VC launch. At the time, I was simply following my passion. Now, I realize that this early experience taught me how to build communities and collaborate for success—skills I rely on every day.

Follow your curiosity. Even if it doesn't seem useful at first, it can become the foundation of something much bigger.

2. Learning Through Travel

Work has taken me to more than 13 countries, each with its unique business culture. Whether negotiating in Vietnam, collaborating in the Middle East, consulting in Europe, or summits in the UK, every experience taught me something new about how people think and work. These insights have shaped my approach to both business and life.

Travel isn't just about seeing new places—it's about understanding new perspectives. Stay curious about people; their stories can teach you so much.

3. Playing Different Roles

From consulting to presales, sales, and strategy, I've worn many hats. Initially, these roles felt disconnected, but I soon realized each one taught me something valuable—problem-solving, value communication, negotiation, and long-term thinking. All of these roles have helped me understand business in a more complete way.

Embrace different roles. Each one adds a layer to your overall understanding, and together, they make the bigger picture clearer.

How to Start Connecting Your Dots

Here's how you can start:

- Reflect often: Think back to key moments in your life. What lessons did you learn?
- Stay curious: Ask, What's the bigger picture here? Curiosity helps you find the hidden patterns.
- Write it down: Track your wins, failures, and insights. It helps you see how everything connects.
- Talk to others: Share your experiences and listen to theirs. Conversations often spark new insights.

As I write this, I see how curiosity has been the thread connecting my dots. It doesn't always happen in the moment, but when you look back, the pieces start to make sense.

Now, I'd love to know: What dots in your life are waiting to be connected?

Stay curious, Vikas
