The First Leader I Ever Knew

Vikas Surani

Hello Curious Minds,

It's another Sunday. Another page in my journey of being curious. Today marks the 29th article in this series — and coincidentally, it's Father's Day.

While the world celebrates dads in their many roles — mentors, protectors, cheerleaders — I found myself reflecting not just as a son or a father, but as a leader.

Because being a father isn't far removed from leadership. Both call for patience when it's easier to rush. Guidance when silence might be simpler. And showing up — every single day — even when you're unsure, unready, or unacknowledged.

My dad may not have spoken the language of LinkedIn posts or boardrooms, but he taught me something invaluable:

| Character matters more than credentials.

| Consistency beats charisma. And

| legacy isn't built in moments — it's built over time, by how you make others feel.

To all the fathers — and father figures — who show up quietly and lead powerfully, this one's for you.

And to the 2378+ of you who've subscribed to Being Curious — thank you for being part of this learning circle. Curiosity keeps us evolving, but reflection makes the journey meaningful.

What's one lesson your father or a father-figure taught you that shaped who you are?

Let's celebrate by sharing and learning — just like every Sunday.
